Customer Reviews

Although I've only been reviewing books for the Vine program for about eight months, I'm continually being surprised and delighted by the blessings I've personally received from the works I've selected to read. Judith Blackstone's extremely worthwhile spiritual guidebook is indeed such a gem. She speaks from a tradition with which I've had little interaction, yet I was continually amazed by the resonances with my own meditative practice of centering prayer. In addition, the psychological underpinnings of her presentation are absolutely in tune with many of my personal observations and scientific perspectives. The exercises given at the end of each chapter are straightforward, easily undertaken, and completely without any sort of ritualistic baggage. On occasion, I've wished that I could quote one author whose works I deeply appreciate to another in some form of ongoing dialogue. I certainly wish I could share some of the insights I've gained from Pierre Teilhard de Chardin (several of whose books I've recently reviewed for) with Dr. Blackstone. His concept of "complexity-consciousness" is absolutely on target with everything she is saying throughout her entire discussion about the importance of understanding and tuning into the "relational field". Similarly, I would very much like to quote Dr. Blackstone to Dr. Lisa Randall, author of "Knocking on Heaven's Door". When I reviewed this latter book for , my major criticism was that Dr. Randall's scientific perspective was simply unprepared to deal with "consciousness" as a reality which, while seemingly not testable by current experimental methods, none-the-less obviously exists.
